the twenty fifth letter of our alphabet, is derived from the Greek letter upsilon (see U), which had two forms, V and Y. Save in a few exceptional cases where y is used, as in Latin, to transliterate Greek words as 'hyperbola,' 'tyrant,' or 'hypo-crite,' it is not descended from upsilon, but from the Greek gamma, g in Middle English assuming a form which became so nearly identical with that of y that ultimately it replaced it, just as the resemblance of y to the rune thorn has led to our writing y instead of the. Meanwhile another letter resembling the form of y, but representing a different sound, was being evolved out of the Anglo Saxon g, which weakened before or after front vowels, and having thus acquired two values, its Anglo Saxon form, ȝ, was conveniently used to denote the weak sound, the Caroline form, g, being reserved for the stopped g. In Middle English this decayed sound was represented by ȝ, and in the 15th century the written forms of ȝ and y approximated so closely as to be almost indistinguishable. Hence, early in the 16th century, after the introduction of printing, the form y came to be generally used instead of ȝ, the Anglo Saxon vocalic y being ultimately replaced by i, or some other vowel. Thus we obtain the double value of y in modern English. In such words as 'ye,' 'yes,' 'yea,' 'yet,' 'year,' which represent the Anglo Saxon ge, gese, gea, gūt, gear, the sign y is not really a y, but stands for the Middle English ȝ, which is the Anglo Saxon form of g. A y appears before back vowels in 'young' and 'yaid' owing to the loss of the front vowel in the Anglo Saxon geong and geard. It has also been introduced by analogy into the words 'you' and 'yew,' from the Anglo Saxon eow and eow, but not into the homophone 'ewe,' from the Anglo Saxon eowu. In some modern loan words, such as 'yacht,' 'yawl,' and 'Yakut,' y has been introduced to transliterate the continental j. The final y, so common in English, also represents an Anglo Saxon g, as in the words 'lady,' of Wuizburg in 1895 to those dark or invisible rays emitted, under the influence of an electric current, from a glass bulb highly exhausted of air through an aluminium window into a close box, and which when passed through the hand or other part of the body imprint a shadow picture of the bones on a sensitive photographic plate—a discovery of high value in surgery, enabling a bullet, &c., embedded in the flesh to be carefully localised.

Y-wis, i wis', adv (Spens) certainly, truly [See Iwis]

the twenty sixth and last letter in our alphabet, is derived through the Greek zeta, from zayn, the seventh Semitic letter. In the 1st century B C it was reintroduced from Greece in the uncial form Z, in order to transcribe Greek words. Together with the symbol, the name zed was borrowed from that of the Greek zeta, whereas if the letter had been continuously retained in the Latin alphabet the name, following the analogy of the other Latin letters, would have been ez. It is curious that zed, the only Semitic letter name that we retain, should have originally belonged to a Phœnician letter which has disappeared from every European alphabet. It can hardly be said that z was an Anglo Saxon letter, as it is only used in Biblical names, such as Zaccheus, even now it appears in very few native English words, the sound, when we have it, being usually represented by s, as in the words 'Wednesday,' 'thousand,' 'tongs,' 'tease,' 'these,' 'his' and 'is'. We use it chiefly for words of Greek, Hebrew, and Arabic origin, such as 'zoology,' 'zephyr,' 'zeal,' 'zany,' 'Zedekiah,' 'Zebulon,' 'azure,' 'zenith,' 'magazine,' 'gauze,' 'zero,' 'zodiac,' or 'gazelle'. Owing to French influence it has taken the place of s in a few English words, such as 'dizzy,' 'frozen,' 'hazel,' 'squeeze,' and 'sneeze,' and it represents a French s in 'hazard,' 'lizard,' and 'buzzard'. It is intrusive in 'citizen' from French citoyen. The sound of our z is a voiced sibilant, either a voiced s as in 'zeal,' or a voiced sh as in 'azure,' French sounds which we borrowed — The cedilla (ç) is a 'little zed,' as is implied by the Italian name zedigha, from zeticula.

Zabian, zā'bi an, adj and n the same as Sabian. — ns Zā'baism, Zā'bism, the doctrines esp of the Pseudo Zabians, or Syrian Zabians (in Haurân, Edessa, Bagdad), remnants of the ancient Syrian but Hellenised heathens, from about the 9th to the 12th century. They themselves derived their

- denomination from one Zābī, variously called a son of Seth, of Adam, of Enoch or Idris, of Methuselah, or of some fictitious Badi or Mari, a supposed companion of Abraham. They were, however, merely heathens who had to a certain extent adopted and modified Neoplatonist ideas, but they produced a host of men eminent in philosophy, astronomy, history, poetry, medicine, &c. — Under the name Zabians used to be grouped several peoples distinct in origin and by no means alike in religion. The mediæval Arabic and Jewish writers called nearly all those heathens or Sabæans who were neither Jews or Christians, nor Mohammedans or Magians. Now the name Sabæans denotes strictly the ancient inhabitants of southern Arabia, who were but little modified by Babylonian influences, the Zabians of the Koran were originally non-Christian Gnostics—the ancestors of the still existing Mandeans (q v) or Joannes' Christians.

A chemical element is a simple substance which has never been decomposed or produced by synthesis. All chemical compounds are made up of two or more of these elements combined together. In the above table it will be noticed that after the name of each element is placed its symbol, which consists of the first, or it may be the first and another letter of the Latin name of the element. Each symbol distinctly indicates the element which it is intended to represent, but it must always be borne in mind that the symbol for an element is not merely a contracted form of its name, but that it stands for a definite quantity of that element, this quantity being the atomic weight expressed in terms of the unit of weight employed. The unit usually employed is the gramme. Thus H stands for 1 gramme of hydrogen, O for 16 grammes of oxygen, and so on. In order to represent the composition of a compound, the symbols of the various elements which occur in it are written side by side, this collection of symbols is a formula. Thus MgO represents 40 (=24+16) grammes of magnesium oxide. When a compound contains more than one atom of the same element, the symbol for that element is not repeated, but the number of atoms is indicated by a subscribed numeral. Thus H_2O means two atoms of hydrogen + one atom of oxygen, these constitute one molecule of water. A number subscribed to a portion of a formula enclosed in brackets multiplies the portion so enclosed, thus $Ba(NO_3)_2$ represents one atom of barium united to twice the quantity of the group NO_3 . A number prefixed to a formula multiplies the whole of the formula that follows. Thus $2H_2O$ represents twice the quantity of water represented by H_2O . Lastly, chemical symbols and formulæ are used to represent shortly chemical changes.

This means that two molecules of sodium chloride have united with one molecule of sulphuric acid to form two molecules of hydrochloric acid and one molecule of sodium sulphate. The above statement is known as a chemical equation.

SYMBOLS USED IN MEDICINE AND PHARMACY

℥ Scruple, ℥i, one scruple, ℥ij, two scruples, ℥ss, half a scruple, ℥iiss, a scruple and a half.

℥ Dram or drachm, ℥i, one dram, ℥ij, two drams, ℥ss, half a dram, ℥iiss, a dram and a half.

℥ A minim, a drop.

āā (Gr ana), of each a like quantity.

℞ (L recipe), take.

The above symbols are employed almost always in medical prescriptions. A prescription consists of the following parts: (1) The Superscription, (2) The Inscription, (3) The Subscription, (4) The Signature. The Superscription, which consists of the letter ℞, is a relic of the days of astrology. It originally was used to represent the symbol of the planet Jupiter. By common consent it is now regarded as representing the imperative mood of the Latin verb, recipere, to take. The Inscription is a statement of the names of the substances to be used, with their quantities. The Subscription is made up of the directions for the guidance of the dispenser. The Signature includes the directions to the patient. This part of the prescription should be written in English, the other parts are in Latin. Sometimes the signature also is in Latin.

The body or prescription contains the following: the Basis, or principal active ingredient, the Adjuvant, or Auxiliary, to assist its action, the Corrective, to correct or diminish some undesirable quality, the Vehicle, or Excipient, to give a suitable form for administration.
